CHAPTER 7

France

The Fifth Republic

During World War II, Charles de Gaulle (1890–1970) was a general in the French army. After Germany conquered France in 1940, de Gaulle fled to the United Kingdom. There, he became the leader of the French in exile and stayed in contact with the French Resistance. The French Resistance established communications for the Allied war effort, spied on German activity, and sometimes assassinated high-ranking German officers.

MAIN IDEA

France was ruined politically and economically by World War II but has since made a full recovery.

WHY IT MATTERS NOW

France is an important member of the European Union and continues to influence the world’s economy and cultures.

PARIS, FRANCE, AUGUST 26, 1944

The liberation of Paris is the result of a two-and-a-half-month advance of Allied forces from the beaches of Normandy in northern France. The French Resistance in Paris began disrupting the German occupiers on August 19, and yesterday, the French army entered Paris.

Region • The liberation of Paris is a significant symbolic victory for the Allies.

Region • Charles de Gaulle is a hero to the French.
On December 21, 1958, Charles de Gaulle was elected president of France. He reorganized the French constitution and instituted the Fifth Republic of France.

The Government of the Fifth Republic France is a parliamentary republic. Governmental power is split between the president and parliament. The president is elected by the public to a seven-year term; beginning in 2002, the president will serve a five-year term. The president’s primary responsibilities are to act as guardian of the constitution and to ensure proper functioning of other authorities.

Parliament has two parts: the Senate and the National Assembly. The president chooses a prime minister, who heads parliament and is largely responsible for the internal workings of the government. The French government is very active in the country’s economy.

A Centralized Economy
World War II left France poor and in need of rebuilding. The National Planning Board, established by Jean Monnet (mow•NAY) in 1946, launched a series of five-year plans to modernize France and set economic goals for the country.
The result of these plans was a mixed economy, with both public and private sectors. The French government nationalized, or took over, major banks; insurance companies; the electric, coal, and steel industries; schools; universities; hospitals; railroads; airlines; and even an automobile company.

This nationalization of industry is a form of socialism. Socialism is an economic system in which some businesses and industries are controlled by the government. The government also provides many health and welfare benefits, such as health care, housing, and unemployment insurance. However, today the French government is slowly placing more of the economy under the control of private companies.

Energy The French economy grew rapidly after 1946, and the country’s industry was powered mainly by coal, oil, and gas. When worldwide oil prices rose in the 1970s, the French economy suffered. In the 1980s, France turned to nuclear power so that its economy would be less dependent on oil. Today France draws 75 percent of its power from nuclear energy, a higher percentage than any other nation in the world.

Most famous for its wines, France also exports grains, automobiles, electrical machinery, and chemicals. Although only about 7 percent of the labor force works on farms, France exports more agricultural products than any other nation in the European Community.

The European Community is an association developed after World War II to promote economic unity among the countries of Western Europe. Its success gave rise to greater unity, both politically and economically, in the European Union.

The Culture of Paris

Paris, the capital city of France, is famous for its contributions to world culture, most especially in the arts. Nicknamed “City of Light,” Paris has long been an intellectual and artistic center.
Edouard Manet (mah•NAY) (1832–1883) helped influence one of the most important art movements of modern times, impressionism. Impressionism is an art style that uses light to create an impression of a scene rather than a strictly realistic picture. Manet inspired such artists as Claude Monet (mow•NAY), Pierre Renoir (wren•WAR), and Paul Cézanne (say•ZAHN). This group of artists worked together in Paris and shared their thoughts and opinions of art.

Paris’s Orsay Museum and the Louvre (loove) house two of the greatest collections of fine art in the world. The School of Fine Arts leads a tradition of education and art instruction that has produced artists such as Pierre Bonnard (bah•NAHR) (1867–1947) and Balthus (1908–2001).

Literature France has a rich tradition of literature as well. Marcel Proust, who wrote Remembrance of Things Past, was an influential writer in the early 20th century. Other significant writers include Albert Camus (kam•OO), who wrote The Stranger, and Simone de Beauvoir (bow•VWAR), author of The Mandarins.
